In 1792, Capt. George Inlay, in a book published in London, wrote "A Typographical Description of the Western Territory of North America." In it, on p. 234, he writes of the *cane-brakes that once covered many parts of ~~North~~ the Ohio Valley. "The cane," he says, is a reed that grows to the height frequently of ten or twelve feet, and it is in thickness from the size of a goose quill to that of two inches in diameter.
When it is slender, it never grows higher than four to seven feet; it shoots up in one summer, but produces no leaves until the following year. It is an evergreen, and is, perhaps, the most nourishing food for cattle upon earth.
No other milk or butter has such flavor and richness as that which is produced from cows which feed upon cane. Horses which feed upon it work nearly as well as if they were fed upon corn.

"Millersport, twenty-five miles below Gallipolis, is a small village in Lawrence County Ohio containing four stores, fifteen or ^{twenty} ~~20~~ houses, and about a hundred and twenty inhabitants."

"Guyandotte, thirteen miles below Millersport, in Cabell County, Virginia, is the most important point of steamboat navigation in Western Virginia except Wheeling. The great stage ~~line~~ ^{route} along the Kanawha to Winchester commences here. It is a flourishing place, containing about eight hundred inhabitants — bones, arrows, stone axes, &c — are found all around it."

"Proctorsville, a small village in Ohio, nearly opposite Guyandotte."

"Burlington, eight miles below, is a small village and the county seat of Lawrence County, Ohio. It contains a court-house, four stores, two churches and about four hundred inhabitants. Lawrence County is in the midst of the Iron Region of Ohio."

The three neighboring counties - Scioto, Jackson, and Greenup in Kentucky make annually about thirty-eight thousand tons of pig iron, which commands a good price. There are twenty-one furnaces in this region, employing about "two thousand persons."

"Big Sandy River, four miles below on the left, forms the boundary between Virginia and Kentucky, for nearly two hundred miles. It rises in the Allegheny mountains, near the heads of Cumberland and Clinch, and is navigable for light crafts to the mountains. Just below its ~~is~~ mouth stands the small village of Catlettsburgh."

(Hanging Rock, this said "derives its name from a cliff of rocks about four hundred feet high, which projects over the rear of the town."

"It is the principal shipping point for the iron manufactured in that region."

"They are about connecting the different mines of this region with this point by means of railroads".

of the West. No. 1. By Judge Wilkinson (under later) 3 photostats. This describes early emigration but is a Pennsylvania story.
It gives the difficulties of early emigration

Wilkinson wrote a series of such letters. His narrative extends down the Ohio To New Orleans & is extremely instructive.
